The book ends with:

"As he drifted off into an uneasy sleep on the floor, his friends laughing and talking all around him, it seemed for a moment like the screen flickered, breaking into patterns of static.

Just interference interrupting the picture, he thought.

Closing his eyes, Byron told himself that he hadn't seen a face staring out at them from the static, that it was just a product of his half-asleep mind.

And he hoped that the eyes he'd seen there wouldn't follow him into his dreams."
